

SRI SIVA KRISHNA TEMPLE

Based on the temple historic reports, Sri Siva Krishna was once an unauthorized shed that was set-up as a place for worship. When a basic shed was raised in Sembawang with the deity of Siva Krishna, the taxi drivers from adjoining areas congregated at the venue for relaxation. The temple administrators further cleared up the place and included more deities. Eventually, the temple started to be known as Sri Siva Krishna Temple.

With the growing number of devotees and revenues flowing in, there was a need for a facelift and a formal presence for the temple. In the year 1982, the temple was shifted to the current location at Marsiling Rise on a land area of around 25000 sq ft. Various committees took charge of the temple maintenance between 1982 and 1987. Finally, in 1987, saw the ground breaking ceremony, and the temple construction followed by the Sangu Stapanam ceremony. The temple has undergone many renovations since then with its first kumbhabhishekam in the year 1996, and the second one in the year 2008.

SHREE LAKSHMINARAYAN TEMPLE

The North Indian community in Singapore dates back to the early 20th century when Indian immigrants from the northern states of Uttar Pradesh, Bihar, and Punjab came to work as herdsmen, dairymen, security guards and moneylenders. Though there was a substantial representation of the community in Singapore, they did not have an exclusive place for worship, and had to visit the Hindu Association at Cuff Road to meet their spiritual needs.

With the increasing population of North Indian immigrants, there was a need for a formal North Indian style temple. The purchase of several residential units by the North Indian community in Singapore culminated in the construction of a beautiful temple. Thus came up Shree Lakshminarayan Temple in Serangoon, which was officially opened on 24 April 1969. Ever since, the temple has been a sanctuary of spiritual values and culture, and has served as a place of devotion, worship, love, peace and harmony.

With periodic upgrades in the temple facilities, the establishment has grown beyond being just a place of worship into an important focal point for the community thereby fostering positive social values and fulfilling the spiritual and cultural needs. Realizing the rapidly changing society in Singapore and to incorporate innovative initiatives, the temple committee has formed a band of young, passionate and enthusiastic devotees from all walks of life thereby engaging them in religious, social and educational activities. With an efficient committee, the temple today functions with better control, good governance and prudent administration.
